Special Editorial

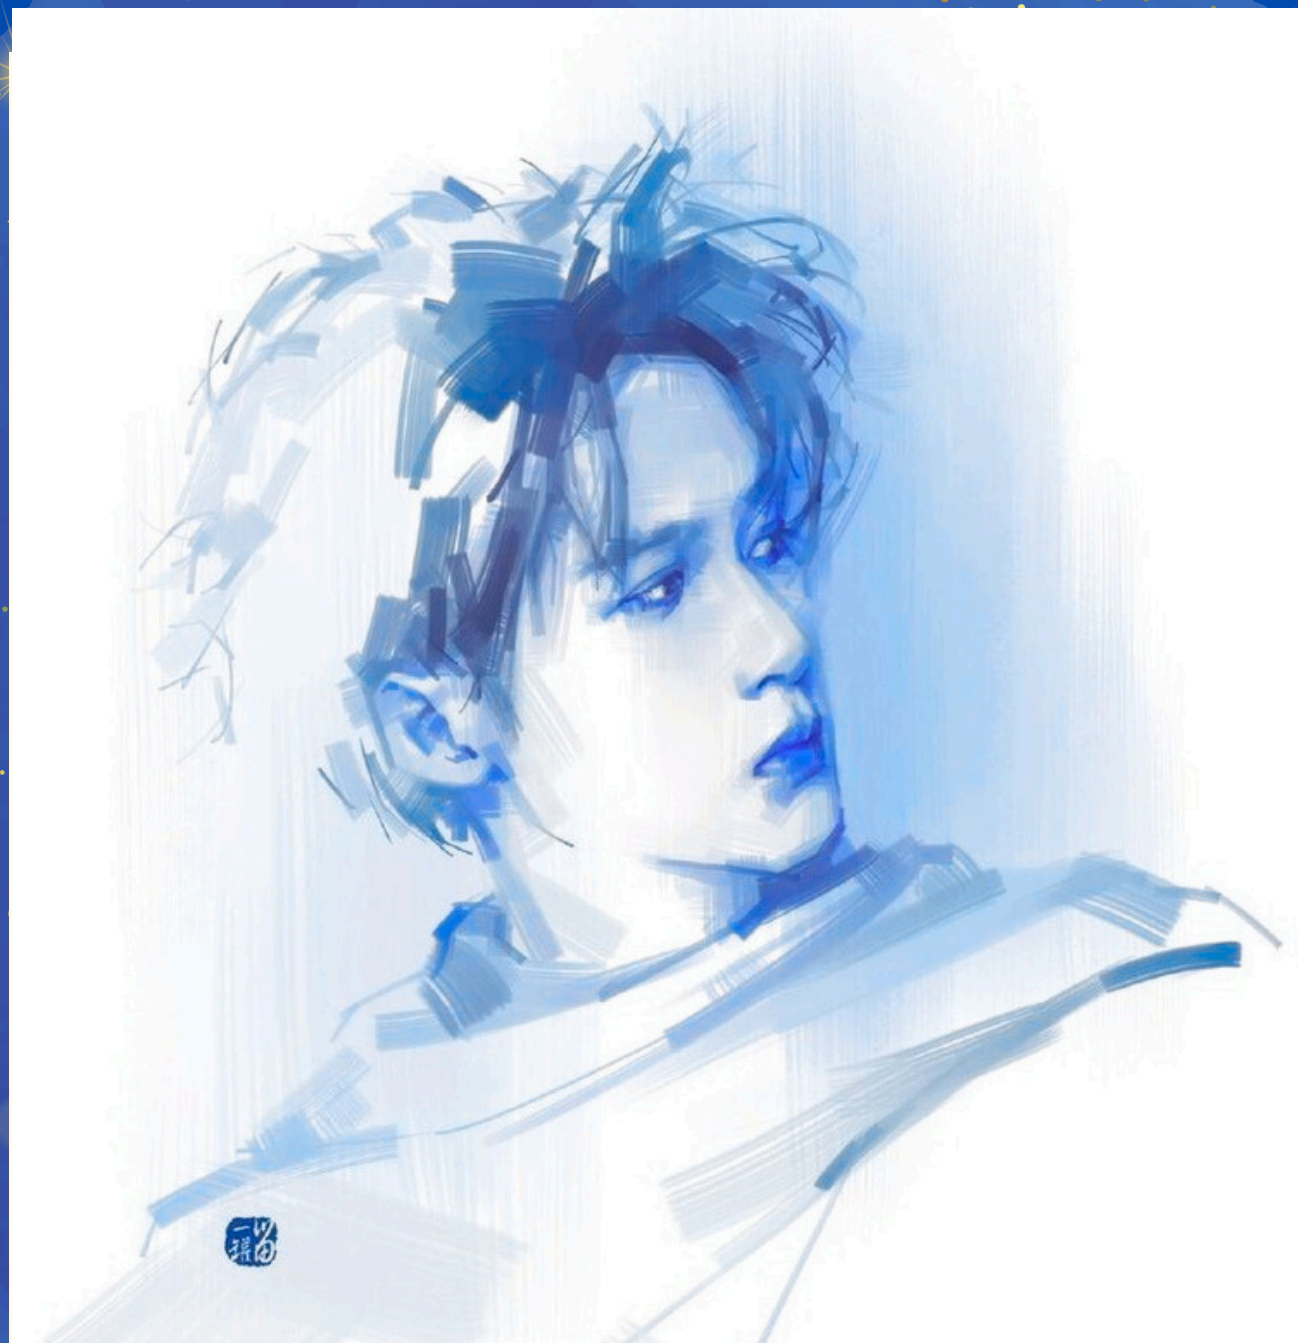

It was a week marked by remarkable brilliance for Tan Jian Ci, shaped by his participation and award at the Tencent night and by the announcement of his third album. The release of the studio photos on December 20, imbued with a distinctly cult atmosphere, and his appearance on the red carpet with the “Another Me” — the golden fish — accompanied by a discourse on multiplicity and a refusal to be confined or defined, confirmed the readings presented in the previous editorial of this magazine.

The announcement of the third album, guided by conceptual and abstract teasers and by the phrase “what you are seeing is not the whole,” follows precisely the same direction. Nothing is offered as a closed form; everything is presented as process, relation, and displacement.

On the Tencent night, beneath a shower of white paper stars, the white embossed star of the album’s first official poster had already been symbolically anticipated. The studio’s use of metalinguage was present in every gesture, every image, every choice — composing a narrative that reveals itself only to those willing to observe with time and attention.

For our reading, nothing was accidental.
